

The airwaves are a public trust and a privilege that is already being badly abused by corporate mega-companies.

This is why I ask the FCC not to weaken the rules that help preserve competition and diversity among the owners of American media.

Radio has already suffered much damage due to the last ownership deregulations, and is increasingly becoming useless to its community.

Large corporate media has done nothing over the past 10 years of deregulation that would make it deserving of additional ownership leniency, and the loss of local ownership has proven to have been detrimental to the listenership/viewership in general.

Please don't allow any further erosion of an already abused public trust. Use of the airwaves is a responsibility that the massive media conglomerates show no signs of respecting, and I would ask that the FCC take their own responsibility in governing these matters more seriously. Our airwaves are our own, and we the viewers and listeners are poorly served by further deregulation.

Sincerely,

Katie Fox
